Riding the Waves

Warning: Some revelations are costly. One must be willing to pay the price.

Free Will is today pretty much a myth. Then again, so too is determinism, fate, and destiny.

As individuals, we normally do not see the big picture, this being that we are all integrally connected, and the complications of human consciousness are beyond understanding by any matrix, or algorithm.

Since the dawn of history, human beings have tried every which way to make sense out of the universe in which we live. Although so many have tried, too this day, no one has totally succeeded.

Essentially, all the world's religions, spiritual paths, and philosophies, may very well offer great insights and revelations, nevertheless, in spite of many religion's claims to the opposite, none have so far provided all humanity with an experience of the uncontested truth.

I predict that they never will. The true human experience is beyond present human comprehension, and no religion, and no God (or “gods”) will ever change this.

Where should the search for meaning take us? Should we continue to explore the world around us? By all means! The study of the sciences teaches us about the truths of the universe in which part of us lives. Yet, there are other parts to our beings other than our physical bodies.

We do not need to get metaphysical to understand that we all have feelings and thoughts, and that neither of these are physical. Feelings and thoughts may very well be influenced by the world around us, yet they nevertheless have a life of their own, independent of external influence.

The worlds of feelings and thoughts can be as real as the physical world. The only difference between these worlds is that we spend the majority of our conscious time in this physical world, and only rarely visit the others, (like in dreams). No wonder that they remain a mystery to most. How can an unexplored world be anything other than a mystery? Yet, just as much of us, (if not more) live in these mysterious unexplored worlds, and their influence affects us in this world, and we rarely understand why, or how.

Most readers want clarity. They want to read words that make sense, that they understand, and say something definitive. Yet, what happens when words are not enough. What happens when there is no clarity, when there is no clear sense, and certainly nothing definite? What happens if we discover that instead of standing on solid ground, we are really standing upon the watery surface of a deep ocean? Can we swim? How long can one tread water?

The world around us only reflects the complexity, and thus the confusion of the inner worlds that ever so strongly influence our external world. All these inner worlds are very real, and yet, we must never create myths, fantasies, or nightmares and concoct stories about these other domains, and the make-believe entities that live there, and what they do, and do not do.

Human history is full of stories of such entities, be they good or evil, and of all these stories, not one of them is true in the way most will think. All entities are both real, and make-believe, both at the same time. They exist because we make them to exist, and if they did not exist within us, they would not be known to us. Thus, they can only exist, to us, within us. Other than this, they can have, for us, no reality.

The entire nature of reality stands upon a foundation that is no foundation. Therefore, anything, and everything that happens is a combination of being arbitrary, and willful, intended, and unintended.

Do not go looking for rhyme, and reason, for sometimes it's there, and sometimes it's not. This is why predicting the exact future is often impossible. Our existence stands upon the quantum reality of infinite variables. Only sometimes can it be foreseen which of these variable will soon materialize into the reality which we all know and experience.

Who is wise? One who can foresee what is coming! Therefore, the truly wise are certainly very few in number. While many futures exist, and some are more inevitable than others, there are still numerous factors, each factor being a separate intelligence that can each influence eventual outcomes.

In order to make sense of our world, we create our own individual models of reality. No one can say for sure if any human-made model is any better, or any worse than any other. This is why the pursuit of expanding consciousness becomes the only criteria through which actual revelations, and universal insights can be achieved.

Our individual minds must continue to expand. Each one must grow until it reaches the horizon of revelation to recognize that all minds are connected, all individual minds, are like drops of water, they are all united in the great sea.

The future unfolds. Things are happening. Watch for patterns. They can be seen with the eye that gazes towards the collective, and away from the individual. There is a pattern, and there is a direction. Some will say that there is a destiny. Yes, some will say many things!

Not all that is said is true, not all that is said is false. Not all that is said will materialize, then again somethings will. Watch for patterns. They may not be there. Then again, that does not mean that you will not see them. They do not have to be there in order to be seen. And yet, what will be seen will be as real as anything else.

The human matrix is complicated beyond the individual attempt to understand it. As wisdom is above understanding, so is the matrix above the individual's attempt to encompass it. Understand then with wisdom, and be wise with understanding. Experience the reality where opposites, and contradictions can be one and the same.

Now, silence your tongue from speech. Still your mind from thoughts. Let go, and learn to swim in the mighty ocean of collective consciousness. Ride the waves, and learn the feel of the current. Only then will you gain a wise glimpse into which future is coming into fruition, here and now, just over the next wave.
